CLOSE OF THE BOER WAR.

The dispersion of General De Wet's isolation and disorganized force marks beyond reasonable doubt the close of the Boer war. This war was begun one year ago to-day, and throughout its entire course it was as heroic on the part of the Boers as it was in reality hopeless. At first great successes of skillful riflemen gave the Boers high hopes, but all others saw that when the almost boundless resources of Great Britain were brought into play there could be no chance of success for the handfuls defending the two Boer Republics.

The success of the Unionists in the English elections is the last nail in the coffin of the Boers, for it pledges all of England's strength to annexation without conditions of the two Boer Republics. They are gone from the map beyond recall, and the struggle for independence will survive in song and story and history only. That it will so survive is beyond question; for the struggle was one of the bravest ever made in this world.

The reported departure of many hundreds of Boers from Lorenzo Marques, the irreconcilables of the war, means a great deal in the future history of Africa. It means that the Boers of the two Republics will not submit to British domination as the Boers of Cape Colony have done. It means that British rule in South and Central Africa is to be complete and unquestioned, and that the stronger personalities among the Boers will leave South Africa and begin life elsewhere anew. Any domination other than British seems to be acceptable to them.

The issue between Boer and Briton for supremacy in South Africa could not be negotiated out. It had to be fought out, costly as the task was to both sides, and a year's time has ended it, and the Britons will now proceed to construct an African Empire extending from the Cape to Cairo, including of course the gold and diamond fields that played a large part in the recent contest.

PROFESSOR ROOSEVELT.

Theodore Roosevelt is having a splendid time in the west. Things out there have gone to his liking. His hat and his cowboy dash have brought him the hurrahs he so dearly loves. So long as the crowd throws up its hat and whoops, New York's boy-like governor is satisfied. He knows then he is sweeping everything before him.

"Necessity Knows No Law."

But a law of Nature bows to the necessity of keeping the blood pure so that the entire system shall be strong, healthy and vigorous.

To take Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier, is therefore a law of health and it is a necessity in nearly every household. It never disappoints.

Tired Feeling—"I had that tired, dull feeling, dyspepsia, headaches and sinking spells, but Hood's Sarsaparilla made me a new man. I never was better than now." JOHN MACK, Oskaloosa, Iowa.

Rosy Cheeks—"I have good health and rosy cheeks, thanks to Hood's Sarsaparilla. It builds me up and saves doctor's bills." MARY A. BURKE, 604 East Clair Street, Indianapolis, Ind.

Hood's Sarsaparilla
NEVER DISAPPOINTS

Hood's Pills cure liver ills; the non-irritating and only cathartic to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Being Theodore Roosevelt he is not surprised.

Besides, the usual amount of fighting talk the governor has given the westerners the benefit of his high conceptions of individual and public duty. They have heard much of civic responsibility. After fighting, this is the governor's favorite theme. He has written books on it, and magazine articles by the score.

The Century, only this month, has one of his characteristic articles entitled "Civic Helpfulness." The governor, by dint of much talking on the subject, has managed to have himself looked upon as the special guardian and champion of civic and official decency. Before his witting glance, the citizen who neglects his duty or the official who neglects his office, have cowered in shame.

The governor has been in the west a month. He is enjoying it, the westerners are having lots of fun out of him and Chairman Hanna is pleased to feel that Roosevelt's hat and swagger are appealing to the west. It is said the governor will find time to get back to Albany, where he has an office, after the election. He has been there four days in the past four months. He is still the governor. It would be foolish to assume that the interests of the great state could suffer so long as they are in the hands of such an insistent professor of all the public virtues as Theodore Roosevelt. Why, a high and consecrated devotion to public trust is the second article in the creed of Mr. Roosevelt. It ought to be enough to satisfy the New Yorkers just to know that the professor of all the civic virtues is their governor without expecting him to stay there all the time. Five days in five months ought to satisfy them. Mr. Roosevelt is illuminating the west and teaching the six shooters fellows what high citizenship and noble statesmanship mean.

FLEETING FAME.

The principle—or the experience—that "a prophet is not without merit save in his own country," or that other common fate of most great men, that they are not appreciated until after they are dead and gone, does not hold good as to the experience of popular orators—"spellbinders," as they have been termed in this closing year of the Nineteenth Century, by the political newspapers. They stand forth an exception, and enjoy the applause of their appreciative admirers face to face.

But when his hour of fretting and strutting upon the stage is over the orator is generally heard of no more, or very seldom, at best.

"When the orator is at the height of his success he usually stands first among popular favorites," says the Atlanta Journal. He often exercises a power which is beyond the reach of the most gifted and most useful of his contemporaries if they lack the witchery of eloquence. But how fast the fame of the orator fades! How little does one generation often know or care about the orators who have swayed the generation that preceded it, who have almost been its idols.

George Canning was probably the greatest English orator of this century. Possibly no other statesman ever had more brilliant triumphs than he achieved in parliament by his wonderful power of speech.

And yet who discusses Canning now?

According to many reliable accounts Rufus Choate was the greatest of American orators, even when both Webster and Clay were at the zenith of their fame, but Choate occupies a small place in the mind of the present generation.

Mr. John Ernest McCann finds in his study of Choate that he possessed a far richer vocabulary than any other American orator. In fact, Mr. McCann says that we must look to Shakespeare to find one who had command of more words than Rufus Choate. Shakespeare uses 15,000 different words and Choate 11,633. The average man uses during his whole life much less than 1,000.

Many of Choate's sentences are very long but they are invariably so clear that the simplest reader can understand them. They must have been more perspicuous to those who heard them spoken by a voice of unrivalled sweetness and illustrated by the action of a well-nigh perfect orator. Wonderful stories are related of the power of Choate's oratory on the platform and the hustings and before juries.

Joshua Van Cott, who heard Choate deliver his oration "The Age of the Pilgrims the Heroic Period of Our History" declared that Daniel Webster, who sat on the platform, broke down and cried like a child.

Others have stated that almost the entire audience was moved to tears.

Few men have lived who held such mastery over the feelings of others and yet the greatest of Choate's orations are now rarely read, though some of them are not fifty years old.

It is fortunate for the orator that contemporaneous applause is lavished upon him, for he is, as a rule soon forgotten.

MOSQUITOES AND MALARIA.

That malaria do not arise from mere atmospheric conditions but are communicated by actual infection may now be taken as a demonstrated fact, the importance of which is obvious. Newspaper readers are aware of the experiment made by some London physicians who have been passing the summer in the Roman Campagna, with no other precaution against the dreaded fever than protection from nocturnal mosquitoes. They were visited toward the end of September by the Italian medical commission, who found them in perfect health while all the residents of the region around them were more or less affected by malaria. They had breathed the same air; had drunk the same water; had taken no special precautions with their food and had gone about freely during the day. Only, from some time before sundown to some time after sunrise they had remained within their specially constructed home so carefully shielded by wire netting as to be mosquito proof.

This is at least a negative demonstration; a counter experiment conducted at the same time affords positive evidence of the agency of mosquitoes in the propagation of malarial fever. Mosquitoes that had been raised in a laboratory were allowed to feed in Rome upon patients affected with tertian ague. They were then sent to London and after a sufficient time the experimenter suffered himself to be bitten by them repeatedly till they died. In due time he developed an unmistakable tertian ague and the parasites peculiar to the disease were found in his blood.

The conclusion from these observations, and many others that have been carried in various parts of the world, both civically and in the biological laboratory, is that malaria is not an atmospheric contagion, as formerly supposed; that is not communicated by the air or by water, but is communicable by inoculation, and that the agents in transferring the disease from one person to another may be certain species of mosquito. It is not demonstrated that mosquitoes are the only agent, and not all mosquitoes are believed to have the same capacity of developing the fever germs; but the discovery here only outlined is no longer disputed and its practical bearing upon the whole conception of malaria is too evident to require particularization here.
